In 1963, just five years before civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated, the percentage of Americans who thought racism was the country's most important problem was its highest at 52%. Today, that percentage has risen again to the largest in more than 20 years, according to a Gallup Poll in December.

While attitudes on race have significantly improved in the 52 years since the March on Washington, the percentage of Americans who are satisfied with the state of race relations has dropped more in the past year than any other marker of national progress, according to a recent Gallup Poll. In 2014, more than half of the country (55%) was either very or somewhat satisfied with the state of race relations in America. This year, that percentage has dropped by 25 points (see graphic below for more details; for graphics on mobile go to the full site). Compare that with the percentage of Americans who are satisfied with health care (that ratio increased five percentage points over last year) or the nation's gun laws (that saw a two-point increase).

In digital age, a push for compassion

Social activist Krista Hazelwood on how words hurt, and on the importance, in this social media age, of teaching children compassion.

The recent deaths of young black men Eric Garner and Michael Brown at the hands of white police officers reflect racial tensions generally associated with the movement of 50 years ago. Those tragic deaths (along with others), have many wondering why, in terms of racial progress, the nation seems to be heading backward instead of forward.

We asked our readers on Twitter and Facebook to tell us how they would solve racial tensions in America and what they thought King would say today. Here are some of their answers in photos, videos and words, along with a glimpse of the national conversation. Take a look, then share your thoughts: What's impeding progress? What can improve race relations in the U.S.? What would King say today?

In today's climate, I think Dr. King will say that he is disappointed because racism still happens everywhere. Not just for blacks, but for all races. This nation needs to hear that it doesn't matter what race or skin color you are, we're all people and we need to be treated equal. Bullying still goes on, too. Race is a factor of that as well. But what people need to hear is "treat people the way you want to be treated." No one wants to be harassed because of what they wear, how they talk, how they look, or how they act. Fairness needs to happen. Peace between "enemies" or "bad people." Treating others terribly doesn't make you cool. Treating
